SYNOPSIS

From the legendary filmmaker and visual artist Ulrike Ottinger comes THE BLOOD COUNTESS, a sumptuous adventure tale and bizarre black comedy soaked in crimson and pulsing with ancient bloodlust. Decades after her mysterious disappearance, the Blood Countess reemerges in modern-day Vienna, where she reunites with her devoted maid, Hermine, to track down a dangerous book with the power to destroy all evil—including all vampires such as themselves. The duo embark on a scavenger hunt through the city's magnificent historic sites, and conscript the countess's melancholic nephew—a vegetarian vampire named Bubi—and his psychotherapist as they expand their search to Bohemia. Meanwhile, a pair of vampirologists and a police inspector remain hot on their trail. Morbidly funny and dazzlingly decadent, THE BLOOD COUNTESS is a reinvention of the vampire myth from one of world cinema's most prodigious minds.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

Travel and locations are my main sources of inspiration. For many years, my cinematic work has moved along the fault lines of global change. This has enabled me to observe how political and economic crises give rise to fears and bizarre fantasies of redemption—simultaneously. They create ideas of the delineated self and the demonized other. Old myths are updated, and the same images appear over and over again. One of these is the vampire, as a symbol of bloodsucking people or institutions that live at the expense of others. This is the stuff from which Hollywood draws its worldview and politics takes its images.

- Ulrike Ottinger

THE STORY OF ULRIKE OTTINGER

Born in 1942, the iconoclastic filmmaker and visual artist Ulrike Ottinger is perhaps best known as the most prominent female member of the New German Cinema, the movement that gave rise to directors like Werner Herzog and Wim Wenders. Ottinger, however, stands in a league of her own. A rare lesbian auteur whose body of work spans across six decades, Ottinger first made her mark with a series of gender-bending fantasias, beginning with her debut Madame X: An Absolute Ruler (1977), about a motley crew of women pirates, followed by Ticket of No Return (1979), a feminist parable about self-destruction. Serving frequently as her own costume and production designer, Ottinger has created a riotous fictional cosmos that embraces spectacle and artifice as a powerful cinematic truth. Deliciously flamboyant films like Freak Orlando (1981) and Dorian Gray in the Mirror of the Yellow Press (1984) stage extravagant tableaux vivants that reimagine cultural archetypes through a provocatively queer lens.

Over the past thirty years, Ottinger has shifted her focus to nonfiction, allowing her wandering spirit and fascination with the traditional practices and rituals of other cultures to dictate her choices in subject matter. Her epic ethnographic documentaries [Taiga, 1992; The Korean Wedding Chest, 2009; Under Snow, 2011] and intimate travelogues [Paris Calligrammes, 2020] explore the history and transformations of everywhere from Mongolia to the arctic seas. With THE BLOOD COUNTESS, Ottinger returns to the realm of fiction, showcasing her baroque and experimental approach to worldbuilding in a macabre comedy that joins ancient legend with modern times.

A CONVERSATION WITH ULRIKE OTTINGER

Did you know from the beginning that you wanted your vampires to explore Vienna? How did the idea for the film come about?

In 1998, I was invited to Vienna, and I decided to travel by car, and take a roundabout way through the eastern countries on my way to Austria. Those places are wonderful; so many beautiful, old cities that seem preserved in past times. That's when I got the idea to do a vampire movie. In Vienna, I began looking for interesting locations. You've got the so-called "Fool's Tower," or "Narrenturm," one of Europe's oldest psychiatric asylums, which is now a museum, ancient tunnels and crypts. There were also mining sites around the city, and during Nazi times, Hitler oversaw all these secret plane and weapon-building operations using forced labor. Travel and location are my main sources of inspiration, and my work moves along the fault lines of global change. And so, I started imagining a film in which we cross a border between the past and the present, the funny and the dangerous, specifically with an eye toward how political and economic crises give rise to fears and bizarre fantasies of redemption.

What attracted you to the figure of the vampire?

The idea that old myths are continuously updated, yet we see the same images over and over again. Vampires are a major example. I always like to play with genre, so I was also interested in finding a way to reinterpret the vampire myth, which is why I emphasized the role of the vegetarian vampire—a young rebel who goes against his family and undergoes therapy in an attempt to restore his normalcy. On the other hand, the Blood Countess and her maid are extreme examples of the vampire's powers of seduction. The "forces of order"—psychotherapists, police, and vampirologists—seek to "capture" the vampires in different ways, but it's precisely their fears and fantasies that allow for the vampires to exist in the first place.

In terms of the script, how did you construct the story to correspond to the roving nature of the film and its emphasis on unique locations?

I have a book that contains sketches and photographs that I use for inspiration, and so with all these collected materials, I made a storyboard that I used to consult with the director of photography, Martin Gschlacht. This is the first time in my life I haven't operated the camera myself! Images are my starting point, but then I decided to build a story that relies on the wide-ranging variations of the chase. The vampires are searching for fresh blood; the Blood Countess is researching her family history; the main thread of the film is the hunt for a mysterious book which threatens the existence of vampire society. Then there are the "forces of order" who constantly seem to be on the heels of the vampires but who are always humiliatingly unsuccessful. These storylines and characters intersect again and again in surprising—sometimes shy, erotic, and/or grotesque—ways.

Can you talk about working with Elfriede Jelinek [the Austrian writer who wrote the novel The Piano Teacher]? How did that collaboration come about?

I started the script many years ago, in the early 2000s, and that's when I went to see Elfriede. The lines of dialogue that she wrote have to do with specific references to Austrian culture and history.

When did you cast Isabelle Huppert and what was it like directing her?

I contacted Isabelle about being in the film in the late 2000s, and she was very enthusiastic. It took a long time for us to get all the money—we had over 20 versions of the script—that we had to shop around to all of our co-financiers. Only in the past five years did we manage to get the money we needed, in part because I was able to sell and show a lot of my paintings for the first time [Ottinger is also a painter who was involved with the Pop Art movement in the sixties] at exhibitions at the Centre Pompidou and the Tate Modern.

Isabelle can do anything, though this role might've been unusual for her as someone who takes on a lot of psychological roles with extensive dialogue. For me, silence can be powerful, saying nothing sometimes works much better than talking too much.

What about casting the other actors—Thomas Schubert as Bubi, the vegetarian vampire; Lars Eidinger as his psychotherapist; and Birgit Minichmayr as the maid Hermine?

With Thomas, there is a sweetness to his face, his eyes, and gestures, that I found to be perfect for the part. Lars, I met two years ago at the Berlinale. I saw him in a film there and immediately thought he had the right crazy energy. Birgit is fantastic. In addition to cinema, she's a magnificent theater actress, and she's also originally from Vienna. She also has something many younger actors have no grasp of—the grotesque; an older style of the grotesque. The American actor Joel Grey [Cabaret, 1972] understood it very well, and so does Birgit!

Your films are always, in part, color stories. Here, red is everywhere.

Red dominates in all forms and materials: brocade, tulle, velvet and silk, glowing charnel houses. Conflagrations. Marbled spiral staircases, wax hearts, garnet necklaces, tartare and blood sausage form a single symphony in red. Plus the very special juice from ruby red goblets. Even the bats have red eyes!

Simply looking at the settings and structures in the film are also part of what makes the film so pleasurable!

Yes, they contribute a dramatic tension of their own.

You've often been your own production and costume designer. What was it like imagining a new world again after all this time since your last fiction film?

Again, I rely on my book of inspirations, which is a massive portfolio with all the images and texts that have helped me build my way of imagining this ancient-modern vampire world. But also, the attraction of the places—their past and present—are part of the film's plot. A chapel decorated with human bones, a Bohemian masquerade hall with trompe l'oeil paintings, the Prater with its colorful rides and references to film history—all of these are elements interacting with the protagonists. I'm interested in a kind of cinema that works like a train, stopping along various bizarre stations, each one breathtaking and intriguing in their own peculiar way.
